The Four Parts of the System

The Children's Convenor

The Convenor's main responsibility is to decide whether or not a child or young person should be referred to the Tribunal. The Convenor also has many other legal responsibilities relating to children and young people and the Tribunal process. The Convenor also provides the administrative and executive support to the four parts of the Children's Tribunal System.

The Child, Youth and Community Tribunal

The purpose of the Tribunal is to make decisions that protect children from harm and promote their health, welfare and development. The Tribunal is a legal forum and the decisions that it makes are legally binding. The Tribunal deals with children where compulsory state intervention may be needed to ensure that they receive adequate care, protection, guidance and control.

President of the Tribunal

The President's main responsibilities are to manage the work of the Tribunal, including monitoring and developing the performance of its members.

The Convenor and Tribunal Board

The Board sets the overall strategic direction for the Children's Tribunal System and provides support and challenge to both the President and the Convenor. The Board does not get involved in operational matters and is not able to make decisions that relate to or interfere with any of the statutory functions of the Convenor, the President or the Tribunal itself.

The Tribunal works closely with several other agencies and roles. This wider community includes the Committee for Health and Social Care, which is responsible for giving effect to the decisions of the Tribunal, Social Workers, Safeguarders (also known as Family Proceedings Advisers), teachers, advocates and a whole range of other professionals and volunteers.
